painfully slow recovery from the shock confronted here and in the knowledge that task is an enormous one. Problems arise daily, even hourly, and under all the circumstances that there is tangible improvement at all should be considered provement at all should be considered gratifying.

Outside of the growing realization of the immensity of the problem before the financial world and of increasing signs of the gradually widening area disturbed by the European war, financial attention centred upon the various plans proposed and actually adopted to meet the needs of the situation. That these measures are experimental is obvious. That some of them may fall to produce the desired results is admitted. Some even aroused hostile criticism. In this class was the Government's scheme for establishing an American mercantile marine. Exception was taken to this action not because it was not an admirable thing in its-1f, but was not an admirable thing in itself, but on the ground that neither the time nor the circumstances make such a step ad-confidence everywhere, and that is the evidence that the late spirit of antago-nism between business and the Administrafunction as the clearing house of the world it is hard to see how matters can mend greatly. It is true that a small amount of exchange business has been done between the two centres, but this has usually been as the result of special arrangements. The difficulty in London is not simply the breaking off of exchange communications with New York, but that a similar paralysis prevails in regard to her communications with the continent of Europe, with her colonies and with practically every portion of the globe.

An almost complete deadlock continues with respect to cotton and many other commodities which usually go abroad in great quantities at this season. Nevertheless, it is patent that a beginning has been made for the reopening of our foreign trade on a liberal scale, and since the food, problem abroad will become one of steadily increasing prominence. It is cartain that lem abroad will become one of steadily increasing prominence it is certain that London will make great efforts to establish proper means for payment.

Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo, by placing several millions of dollars in the local banks for the sole purpose of increasing the supply of credits available for the exporter, has helped the situation to some extent. But the principal reason for the continued interruption of foreign commerce is the state of the financial markets abroad, which are such that the exporter here has no assurance that he masine is that this step has been assumed to be a pressing need of the present situation and a step which is to help solve the question of the movement of foreign trade. An American mercantile marine as such will not help the present situation at all. Shipping facilities are abundant. There is a vast number of foreign owned ships now lying in American ports waiting for cargoes. The commercial success of an organization of the kind proposed would probably be difficult at any time. It will be absolutely impossible unless radical changes are made in our navigation laws so that our ships can compete on equal terms with the world. One unpleasant effect of the continued suspension of business on the stock exchanges has been the keeping of a vast amount of credit in a state of rigidity. This has necessarily worked hardship upon the business world. The requirements of commercial borrowers have had to be curtailed. In this way the credit stringency induced by the European war has administered a direct check to business.
